The one-day virtual event brought together top healthcare industry leaders and startup organisations

NATHEALTH-Healthcare Federation of India, in collaboration with TiE Mumbai, and with IQVIA as knowledge partners, has launched its initiative 'Reimagining Healthcare: Industry-Startup Interface Series'.

The initiative is set to serve as an effective and credible interface that facilitates meaningful partnerships between the healthcare industry and the startup community. The initiative was announced through a webinar recently.

The Renal Project working in the area of dialysis management; V Engage working in the area of teleconsultation and telemonitoring; Meradoc working in the area of telemedicine access; CanceRX providing clinical support for oncology and Bynocs which provides a software to accurately diagnose binocular vision anomalies and works for related therapies - were the few startups that participated in the webinar event and shared successful collaborative model with the industry that have been implemented so far.

The startups highlighted the need for better collaboration between the industry and the startups to pace up the momentum of innovation in healthcare. The emphasis was on digitisation taking a front seat during COVID-19 and how with the help of technology, Indian healthcare has been able to deliver health services in remote parts in the country.

The one-day virtual event brought together top healthcare industry leaders and startup organisations to reimagine India's present healthcare scenario to build resilience towards future emergencies and pandemics. The industry-startup interface series has been organised to present opportunities for startup organisations to network and collaborate through industry tie-ups on corporate partnerships.
